Diverse groups in the world, who have different profiles of access to health care, vary markedly in rates of cervical cancer. Several simple, screening-based, strategies have been implemented to reduce the burden of cervical cancer. It appears that a major contributor to the increased rates of cervical cancer in women in Latin America is the persistence of high rates of human papillomavirus (HPV) infection and a sub-optimal health care system that does not permit routine HPV testing. The evidence that the vaccine is efficacious at inducing protection against the acquisition of HPV is compelling. Despite these compelling data, multiple questions regarding the economic cost-benefit of a vaccine remain. In the absence of an ongoing randomized control study or sufficient epidemiological and economic data to confidently draw conclusions, we must accept that, at this time, it is not possible to determine with certainty the merit of the vaccine. However, the current evidence base indicates a definite role for the development of an efficacious and safe vaccine for use in both males and females and, ideally, to incorporate both HPV types 16 and 18, and a means to protect against infection and cancer across all target populations.Q: What is the correct syntax for referencing a variable?
